

JILL FREEDMAN

Street Jazz By Jonas Cuénin

"What saddens me is that at my age I have no faith in the goodness of human nature."

he Jill Freedman charm | is someone for whom there's | on each other. We're the deprais just so hard to resist. At only a thin line between pleaseventy-five this lifelong sure and pain. Milk-white winter lover of endless chats and prioutside, her tropical living room celess anecdotes has you spellinside: from her comfortable bound one minute and laughing leather armchair she jams with out loud the next. Not driven by words and stories, then without any inner need, or because she's warning goes into a rock'n'roll showing off, but out of the same rant against the rottenness of a generosity that pervades her world she will pillory until her photography-an oeuvre harking dving day. Most of the time she's back to a time when authorial striking back against the lunatic compassion was the vardstick bombast of the women newsreaimages were measured by. In her ders on CNN and Fox News, deli-Harlem apartment, with Central cious victims she turns on at Park a stone's throw away, she noon with her latest toys: HD brings the same warmth and ten-Ready screen, Apple TV, MacBook derness to serving coffee as she Air. Freedman is the "peace cordoes to the people in her pictures. respondent" she's always wanted Visitors are rare in this place that to be, permanently angered by looks like a shrine-and with Iill American policy and, in this Freedman looking like the keeper month of January, very moved of the flame. There's no obvious by the Charlie Hebdo massacre. order: prints are jumbled with Each event, each tragedy, trigbooks and personal notebooks gers the deep, intense look and the empathy for the underdog in an archive that makes you think of a treasure trove; and which, in this world of ours, can gives you an irresistible urge shock and sometimes disturb. to rummage through a life that From the home that is her refuge, seems way out of the ordinary. A Freedman brings an acute eye life Freedman enjoys recounting to the 21st century. Makes you via numberless comedy routines think of Chris Marker, the Red. and hilarious one-liners, against holed up in his Paris apartment and studying the evolution of his a constant musical background shot through with syncopation fellow humans on TV. A strange and jazz overtones. An unbroken kind of observation, this, passion theater that turns her images mixed with a laziness in powerinto fables and reveals her as ful contrast with her intellectual much more than a virtuoso vitality. There are a few regrets, photographer. Big blue eyes, red too: "What saddens me is that at cheeks, throaty voice, disheveled my age I have no faith in the hair: she looks like a street clown. goodness of human nature. I tend a force of nature-and every to like everybody, but with the word brings the kind of transfifirm conviction that any other guration you find in remarkably animal species is more highly gifted interpreters of life. Freedevolved than us. All we do is desman might love play-acting, but she also has her serious side: this | speed information is use it to spy | tively. She seems to have lived ved monkeys you see in Hollywood movies. Ten years from now there might be no water or food left, and people don't seem to care. Animals, as a rule, only kill to eat. That's why I find politics so hard to put up with. History is repeating itself indefinitely. Did you see any bankers behind bars after the big crisis? Everyone's so pleased with themselves for getting Obama elected. A president who's a danger to the freedom of the press and in love with drones. You don't get to where he did by being Mr Nice Guy. I can't get all these stories and conflicts out of my mind. I think it comes from what happened in Paris. Those poor people. That really touches me. Make me stop..."

rebel with a big heart, Freedman is also a mar-velous storyteller. A bohemian with her own set of excesses, blind spots, and fearsthe same as all the others, and even those who hid it, like Cartier-Bresson the drinker. Doisneau the insecure-together with the gut obsession they share: to work for the good of humanity. She insists that she's still only twelve, and can see herself turning thirteen soon-but what for? "Twelvenot a bad age to already know everything about everything." Her bohemia is total non-identification, being able to change her mind about everything, having fun with her friends, partving, having lots of lovers and physical affection-and traveling troy. All we do with this high- of course, literally and figura-to a happy childhood, she talks about her passion for softballbaseball's kid brother, but played with a bigger ball. The only girl in her school team, the Mighty Midgets, she was shortstop, fielding between second and third base; as a batter she came in fourth, the «cleanup» position: "One day I hit two home runs in a row I was the one who would drive you home."

ENCOUNTER

"Coming to New York is always a way of getting away from your life"

Later, at university in Pittsburgh. where she was born on 19 October 1939, she studied sociology and anthropology: interests she sometimes dropped for her other great enthusiasm, music, and the jazz group she sang with in bars full of steel workers and miners. Using the same warm, dense voice as on this fine winter afternoon, as a crackly LP murmurs the opening bars of her all-time favorite. Stan Getz's Here's That Rainy Day: "Da da da da Da deedeeda dadadee... Da da da Da Deedee... Da da Deedooda Dedoo Oodee Oo sweet ooosh ee da da didoo. That's major minor. Wow!"

nvone who's met lill Freedman knows she's got itchy feet. No sooner did the beautiful twenty one year old blonde have her degree than she set off to Israel. By ship, of course: "Tve always preferred ships to planes. I would have loved to be a sailor, actually. In Israel I soon found myself flat broke so I started singing in the street and in clubs." There followed four years of wandering through Europe: Marseille, Paris (where she sang at La Contrescarpe on the Left Bank), and then London, where two years, including appearances | a few jokes to people you don't | a conscience those pictures cer- | have been sleeping in a hotel and a thousand lives. Looking back | on the famous BBC Tonight Show. | even know. I liked that straight | tainly have something to do with "Just me and my guitar," she says off." proudly. "When the money ran out we did another show, and It was in the Village that she so on." One of her great expedeepened her visual and literary riences of the time still sets her side, developed a taste for words eyes sparkling: going back to the with a real edge to them, and an States on board the legendary obsession with quotations: rea-Queen Mary; five days looking ching into an old drawer, she pulls out four fat envelopes full out over the immensity of the ocean. "It was a great period. I've of bits of paper with the ones that have marked her most writalways loved that kind of freedom. That's why I never married. ten or typed on them. Hundreds All my life my boyfriends were of sentences, including one from always a little jealous. I always John Steinbeck that partly sums wanted to be out and about, up the soul of America: "In the spending time in my darkroom, United States the poor see themgoing out to listen to jazz. Getting selves not as an exploited prolemarried meant staying home. Out tariat but as temporarily embarof the question... I love men. You rassed millionaires." can really have fun with them.

you know. But then they get all Exclusive circles ardent and serious."

Because her pictures often treat their subjects kindly, and because hen she arrived in New York in 1964 the standthey can home in on social injus up city was entering its tice bur rarely have that "horror most culturally prolific period. of war" impact, Jill Freedman's The natural place to live was political commitment shows Greenwich Village, Ground Zero through less in them. They are not so much reactive as testifor everything creative and nonconformist, for the counmony to an upbringing that terculture, and for intellectual emphasized altruism. "My photos get-togethers: a different kind are political." she insists. "because of neighborhood, celebrated in they give freedom a voice." Even both movies and photography. so, the crucial element in sha-"I often went to the Lion's Head, ping her way of seeing was an a pub where writers from the atrocity image. Looking through Village Voice and other local copies of Life magazine dating papers hung out. Real characters from the Second World War. and marvelous talkers. After all. Freeman, then aged nine, came it doesn't matter if a story's true upon photos of the concentration or not as long as it's good, right?" camps just liberated by the Allies: "Every day when I came in from

She spent thirty years in the Vilschool I looked at those pictures. lage, camera in hand, smilingly and I cried... and then I went and discreet, checking out the trendy spots and the frenzied streets for did that for a year. It wasn't as scenes and characters. "Coming to New York is always a way the war. One day my parents of getting away from your life. found out [her father was a trafrom those small-town microveling salesman] and straight cosms where everyone knows away they burned all the magaevervone else. In New York vou zines. That was probably my don't have to know your neighbor, all you have to do is say hi, and one of the reasons for beco- of course. It was a good thing I she earned her living singing for how you doing, see you! Crack ming a photographer. If I have wasn't on assignment, or I would it, because I've been obsessed by the Holocaust all my life."

31

1 efore she bought her first camera "on a whim" in 1965. lill Freedman was recording images in her imagination: snapshots engraved on her visual memory that were preludes to some of the photos she would take a little later on Her subjects. the war in Vietnam, and anti-war and civil rights demonstrations. At the time she was working as an advertising copywriter-the only real job she has ever hadand spending every pay packet on equipment. "There was my first Nikon F, that I made love to-well, I mean. I used to give it little kisses. And then the two of us would go out for a walk."

"In the United States the poor see themselves not as an exploited proletariat but as temporarily embarrassed millionaires."

When Martin Luther King was assassinated in 1968, she quit her job straight away to join the march for the Poor People's Campaign, the last crusade King embarked on before his death. In 1971 her pictures of demonstrations, portraits of demonstrators, and scenes of police brutality came together as the book Old News: Resurrection City-but before that she had played ball outside. It was odd; I been published in Life: "There must have been five or six picthough we'd lost anyone during tures. I remember giving my films to the magazine without really knowing what they would do with them. I even hesitated, because I was afraid they would damage the negatives. That was first experience of photography silly of me-they were careful.

"A mind is like a parachute. It does not work if it is not open."

wouldn't have taken all those | marked by a slightly sexy naiphotos in the thick of things. Late and demonstrated and slept with all the others, often in churches in the towns we passed through."

reedman has always had an instinctive preference for the inaccessible, and for slipping in amongst people she knows nothing-or almost nothing-about. It would be mistaken, though, to think that this vast curiosity-the leading attribute of her own photography and the photographers she admires-has anything to do with the voveurism emanating from some current work of this a profound honesty—a word that today, in an art world obsessed with challenges, can seem anachronistic. The seven books she has to her credit take us into the daily life of societies that are "closed", at least from the point of view of the common man. Leafing through them, you can't help thinking about the splendid sentence from Frank Zappa she once noted down: "A mind is like a parachute. It does not work if it is not open."

probably Freedman's finest book. kind. Her work has always been Under the big top of the unique vety which is nothing other than in the Northeastern United States. the atmosphere is an indescribably magic mix of joy and drama: a crazy tale of men and animals living side by side, told in a hundred photos imbued with an incredible tenderness. A man head to head with an elephant: a clown putting on his makeup as a cat sleeps tranquilly beside him; as far as you can get from the jungle, an elephant pushing a cage with a lion inside it; and a giant hand in hand with a tiny woman dwarf. Plus a host of portraits, people whose eves show Circus Days, published in 1975, is the same mingling of melancholy and amusement. An adventure

Clyde Beatty-Cole Brothers Circus | of travelling and performancesthat began almost on Freedman's doorstep: "It all started when I met Cleopatra, a drag queen from the Village. A great lady. She told me about a circus where she rode elephants wearing a satin dress and a feather boa. I loved the story at once. I borrowed a Volkswagen kombi and headed off in search of a circus of my own. With the Clyde Beatty-Cole Brothers Circus we traveled at night. put the tents up in the morning, on a vacant lot or behind a supermarket, did two performances, and set off that night for the next town. When I was a kid I'd always wanted to be carunlike any other-seven weeks ried off by gypsies, so I was just Enfants jouant aux imbéciles (Goofy kids), Dublin, 1985.

ENCOUNTER

ENCOUNTER

Fille à Harlem (Harlem girl), New York, 1966.

Esprit de Noël (At the spirit of Christmas), New York, 1969.

distinct classes: actors, clowns, and workers. But with a little bit of charm I managed to find a people I'm working with." place for myself. I also remember not having enough money to get my films developed, so I had no idea of the result until the odyssey was over."

riven by curiosity and an relentless urge to understand things, Freeman then decided to hang out with New York's firemen, a long-term project that culminated in the book cers, some of them Vietnam vete-Firehouse (1977), "They're the opposite of soldiers," she says. subject matter means that the "They don't take life, they bring it back." In three different firehouses in Harlem and the Bronx, she wrote herself, are more raw the Irish people. Freedman has He taught her everything, she she spent two years immersed than usual Night and day Freed- published two books on Ireland, says. "When I was out walking in in their world: "Such handsome | man played the newshound the | a country dear to her for its | the street with Fang I saw eveguys... But since women weren't way Weegee had done before her, landscapes, its folklore and its rything, felt everything, He had a the fire chief's car. Besides, I have admits to having sometimes been (2004). a rule: I never sleep with the a voyeur. But despite the oppreskindheartedness is still there, in

These explorations soon led to the pictures she got of converanother legendary and even sations, laughter, and above all more inaccessible circle: NYPDthe New York Police Department. was an exhibition at the Photo-Long a critic of the forces of to "uncover their job from the wrote in the visitors' book, 'Now inside, from a human point of I see them differently.' That's the as broadly as her mouth. It's her view," and at the same time "show best compliment the series could favorite, and almost a motto what a good cop's like." The offi- have."

rans, called her "the liberal." The A dog's life

Firehouse, accompanied by texts to those not ready to love it: "with a white rump and cheeks."

delighted. The circus has its own | allowed to sleep in the dormi- | her camera catching the heroic, | whiskey: A Time That Was: Irish rigid pecking order, with three tory, I would spend the night in the sordid, and the bloody. She Moments (1987) and Ireland Ever

> But while she is deeply fond of sive atmosphere, her uncommon human beings, she prefers animals and can talk about them with irresistible admiration. In one of her her notebooks we find rescue operations: "Street Cops | a tellingly ironic line from Groucho Marx: "Outside of a dog, a graphers' Gallery in London, the book is a man's best friend. Inside law and order, she now set out top UK photo venue. Someone of a dog it's too dark to read." When she quotes it her eyes smile when you learn that Freedman, a self-taught artist and a booklover, only ever had one real photography teacher: a certain Fang. pictures in Street Cops (1982) and One last circle, with entry denied a chocolate-brown royal poodle, to look, because he never missed all I had to live off." At the time a thing. Wouldn't it be terrific if her economic gambit was to people had as much vision and goodness as dogs?" Obviously there is a book devoted to them: in Jill's Dogs (1993) she speaks of her unswerving love for canines. and their brotherly relationship with human beings. Funny, touching images, similar in tone to the best by her compatriot Elliott Erwitt.

Contraception (Birth control), West Village, New York, 1976.

When Fang took Iill out walking, she could see. See the other dogs, sure, but also a whole lot of unsuspected riches. Beginning with all those timeless scenes, often caught with her Leica, during her wanderings on her home ground and elsewhere. Ordinary scenes with no real subject: a simple ode to existence and its special moments, be they commonplace, amusing, cultural or iconic. A ramble through the streets against a jaunty, swinging soundtrack, with children in pride of place-as if every photo they appear in were the revelation of some eternal regret. Standing apart from her books and up until now hardly explored at all-never published or even shown-this segment of he work is now being gradually rediscovered by the artist herself: "Oh, yes... That naked couple on the beach, that was in the South of France. I'd completely forgotten this print. And this one of the little girl with her head out a train window."

n the 1970s Freedman was "a star", as Robert Stevens, photography historian at the International Center of Photography (ICP), points out. A star, true, but leading a precarious existence a bit like today. Out of books I wanted. Later I became conviction, you might say. Given the lack of commissions most of rented out the deckchairs on the her meager income was going in beach. He was my cat-sitter when rent; the lifestyle she had cho- I was out of town. People [on the sen came close to making her photography scene] thought I homeless. "All I thought about was dead."

unpack a sidewalk "street gallerv" on a tablecloth outside the Whitney Museum. "Sometimes people took my name and called me to buy a Christmas present. At $35 a picture it wasn't expensive." The seventies were also the beginning of photography's rise, and Freedman was always there when the top photographers of the time got together: in a photo she pulls out of a bottom drawer she's cavorting on André Kertész's knees, in the oblivion. In today's photography company of Roman Vishniac, Joel world, where success hinges on Meverowitz, Arnold Newman, knowing the right people, jost-Neal Slavin, David Hockney, and ling your way to the front, and Duane Michals: "Oh. marvelous giving the public what it wants. Duane. If you run into him, send she's an extraterrestrial. Because him my love. It's twenty years | she's opted for less traveled paths and never submitted to any of since I've seen him." A distant memory, but one that conjures up the rules, her prodigiously rewarher early sources of inspiration: ding oeuvre bears the stamp of the immaculate. It's a kind of Dorothea Lange's remark, "The camera is a tool for learning to see without a camera"; but most of all W. Eugene Smith's arresting Wounded, Dying Infant Found by American Soldier in Saipan Mountains, of 1944.

"Maybe I got out of photography circles because of all those egos. Not many photographers of our time have kept their sense of humor. They're so serious".

"Maybe I got out of photography circles because of all those egos. Not many photographers of our time have kept their sense of humor. They're so serious. In 1992 I moved to Miami and spent ten years reading quietly, all on my own. I rented an apartment on Miami Beach, just next door to New York frenzy of her early a library that ordered in all the vears. She spends the rest of the time dreaming: of "crazy nights friends with Freddy, the guy who with entertaining friends"; and like everybody in winter, of sand and sun, and fine food and wine. Then there's the dream that's been an obsession for weeks and is about to come true next month-

ENCOUNTER

great instinct. He taught me how | was my pictures, and they were | in here are lots of famous | flying out to Costa Rica with the great writer she's still looking for. "the soul mate she never had."

> One thing for sure, Iill Freedman has kept a freshness lots of people find irresistible. Because love is ageless. Sometimes at night she leaves her Morningside Park neighborhood-the park itself is opposite her apartment-and goes out to listen to jazz on her own. It was on one of those evenings when she let loose a maiestic tirade worthy of a Woody Allen movie: "Why am I here? A question philosophers have been asking down the ages. Why was I born? Why am I here? What's the meaning of ... What's the meaning of meaning? Is there a life after life? You call that life when it's raining and you can't get a taxi?" When it's time to leave she closes the door with that same childlike gaze, and the look of a goddess ready for another century of incredible adventures. "Make your article sexy," are her parting words. Rock'n'roll, baby.

> > Ionas Cuénin.

blunt political statement, a pure reflection of her convictions and values, and a goldmine of endlessly zany experiences. The sum total of a career that never was-which is doubtless the most extraordinary thing about it. As Freedman never takes off her thinking cap, she's currently working mentally on her next book. She already has the title-Madhattan-and the content is waiting to be filtered out from among all those images of the incarnations of street photography and the humanistic tradition. No need to name them. Some of them haunt the photo festivals and fairs, cameras slung around their necks, paparazzi for a day, on the qui vive. In Jill Freedman's case the legend has all but been replaced by indifference. Because she never succeeded in shaping and maintaining that legend? Because she's always been an eccentric?

Probably. But that's not enough to explain her apparent fall into